

Cristina Nitopi

by Stella Ford on Wednesday, February 18th, 2009

Cristina Nitopi's menswear collection was presented on Sunday, February 15, at the legendary Waldorf Astoria. The crowd was a mix of laid-back Sunday spectators and beautiful people in innovative fashion designs.

The mood was created by an incredible performance by violinist Jane Hunt. Cristina Nitopi's show started with a bang. Her first look was a black lace top and bottom coordinate set. It was definitely shocking to see such feminine elements incorporated into men's designs. The colors throughout the collection were brilliant neutrals including black, tan, white, denim and a little animal pattern. Another memorable piece from the collection was a floor length faux fur winter white coat. There were also coats with interesting elements like deep hoods and velvet back panels running down the length of the coat. The models were void of body fat and hair while working the runway. Every single model had an amazing physique, which was at times distracting to the crowd. The overall feel of the collection was adventurous, because only men with perfect bodies and all of the confidence in the world could pull off those looks.
